Description:

Like Jean P. Sassoons Princess, this emotionally charged debut novel offers a penetrating look behind the curtain of secrecy that shrouds modern Iran, exploring the dreams of the women there and telling the dramatic story of an American-Iranian woman whose once-perfect life and love fall victim to the battle between old and new ways.

I've enjoyed the story as much as everyone else, and the book is hard to put down, but the author's style bothers me somewhat. I like books where multiple characters tell the story from their own points of view, but this author has several characters telling it in the first person, present tense, then switches in some chapters to the third person, then goes to flashbacks, all in no particular order. To enable the reader to follow what is going on, when using multiple characters to tell a story I think the first or third person should be used consistently and there should be some kind of time line. This is particularly true for readers who may not be familiar with a country's history. Otherwise I liked this book a lot!
